Excerpt: . . . critics and defies classification. It may be too that because he did not follow strictly the code of his school that he produces a masterpiece--and incidentally a new movement. New art movements, forsooth! How they sprout, develop, multiply, divide, and finally dwindle into dead roots. Genius alone remains. Indeed, despite the movement that gave him birth and not by reason of it, the great artist survives. Here, for instance, are the different revolutionary movements that followed the French Impressionist school of 1870: there were, to begin with, the Post-impressionists and the Neo-impressionists, who were followed and swallowed by the Divisionists, the Pointillists, the Intimists, the Cubists, etc. And they all, we are told, aim more or less at truth to nature; they all try to surprise nature in her negligé, as it were, and they shun her in her make-up. Hence the research magnificent...
